SOCIAL EMOTIONAL LEARNING AND RESTORATIVE JUSTICE:

Teaching Our Children Peer Relationship Skills for a Safe School Climate

February 2, 2017 / 12 pm

Community Consolidated School District #93 Administration Center
230 Covington Drive / Bloomingdale

Educators everywhere recognize the importance of fostering positive school climates. Helping students learn from their mistakes is another goal to which school personnel strive. Increasingly, they are partnering with parents, students, district officials, community organizations, and policymakers to move away from harmful and counter productive zero-tolerance discipline policies and toward proven restorative approaches to address conflict in schools. This workshop will provide an introduction and overview of Restorative Practices. Participants will learn strategies to build strong relationships and community in classrooms and school-wide. Here is a review of the supportive framework for restorative practices, including the basic principles for restorative circles. Learn the action steps to make restorative methods part of the fabric of daily life in our schools and how we can help transform schools to support the growth and health of all students. Pamela Randall-Garner Ed.D is a Senior Staff Advisor for the Collaborative for Academic, Social, and Emotional Learning (CASEL). Its mission is to ensure all students become knowledgeable, responsible, caring and contributing members of society. Randall-Garner has held distinguished leadership roles for high schools in the Houston, Chicago and St. Louis public schools coaching principals to create community partnerships and high-quality teams.

Get ^{the} CONVERSATION started

Teens have access to thousands of peer and media messages daily. They need social-emotional skills and scientific information they can trust to inform their decision making. Studies show that youth are more influenced by their families than any other source.

You may not think they're listening, but they are.

Start Talking. We'll show you how.
